Description

As the rate of divorce and separation in parents continues to rise, the children are often silent and powerless victims. The parents tell themselves that their children are resilient and will adjust. Sometimes that is true but sometimes it is not. When the parents' splitting is acrimonious the pressure increases on the children exponentially. Children from these families often come to us for therapy. They present with a complexity of issues (behavioral, developmental, emotional) and the parents may bring their own unresolved conflicts into our offices along with their children. Complicating our jobs are ethical questions and concerns when parents disagree regarding aspects of their children's lives and their treatment. If the Courts become involved, which may happen with or without our advance knowledge, the therapist has then entered the world of forensic practice. With this added role, which is unavoidable in these cases, comes a new set of ethical and legal considerations.

This workshop will examine the following questions:

- How do we as clinicians continue to serve the needs of these children, while preserving and protecting our practice goals and standards?
- How can clinicians help separating families to work together to mitigate parental alienation?
- What are effective approaches to offering Parent Reunification Therapy?
- How does Equal Parenting as a presumption often serve the best interests of the child?

Objectives

Course participants will be able to

1. Identify the sources of ethical and practice standards when dealing with clients who are involved in family law issues.
2. Identify when a case becomes a forensic case and what roles the clinician may play.
3. Demonstrate knowledge of record keeping and informed consent with a forensic client/family.
4. Analyze how to maintain their duty to the client while responding ethically to attorneys and the court.
5. Identify actions that they should and should not take when dealing with attorneys and the courts.
6. Understand how to ethically preserve their therapeutic relationship with the client/family and legally protect themselves.
7. Identify at least three ethical dilemmas when working with children from high conflict separation and divorce.
